

NEW-YORKISMS.

From Our Own Correspondent. NEW YORK, Aug. 8, 1870. The Nathan Murder.

Nothing of any importance has been elicited from the inquest that was held to-day. It is the opinion of some of the most experienced reporters that nothing definite ever will be known with regard to the question, Who killed Mr. Nathan? and although more than one reporter has made a fool of himself in the endeavor to construct a flawless theory, yet one occasionally meets with a newspaper-man whose life has been spent among the courts and whose judgment is worth at least some consideration.

There is a good and a bad class of police-reporters, as well as a good and a bad class of police-detectives, and some of the most intelligent members of the better class in each of these professions seem to believe that the mystery of Mr. Nathan's death will never be cleared up. They unite in believing that the murder was the work of two sneak thieves, and experience has proved that people of that grade do not, as a rule, "peach" on one another. Perhaps the only hope on which the discovery of the murderers can be reasonably based is the chance of a quarrel happening between them in some low grocery. In the heat of the quarrel some dark menace might be dropped which a least-suspected bystander would be sure to remember and make use of. The feeling against Washington Nathan is gradually ebbing away from the public mind. There is hardly a New York newspaper that would not rejoice to see that wicked journal, the Sunday Mercury, made to totter under an overwhelming libel suit brought against it by that outraged and innocent young man.

Man-Milliners. A man-milliner has established himself in Ninth street, not very far from Broadway. He is said to have been a pupil of Worth's, the celebrated Paris milliner. Perhaps that is merely a rumor. At any rate it is not necessary to my present purpose that it should be a fact. I merely mention it because it seems expedient to say a few words in favor of a class of men—an extremely small class—who are liable to great abuse from every one except the fashionable women whom their handwork pleases. If a man have a singular aptitude for a particular form of labor which has hitherto been transacted by women only, but which is not universal, why should he not devote himself to that particular department? What is it but prejudice that forbids? Why should woman crowd man out of the law office, the pulpit, the reporter's room, and the physician's consultation den, unless man is to enjoy compensation for being so remorselessly put about? Do two rights ever make a wrong? Never, emphatically never—unless woman's rights are one of them. I believe that with the enlargement of the sphere in which feminine influence is felt, man's sphere will also enlarge. The more women there are that become tailors, the more there will be that become dress-makers. Worth, the champion man-milliner, will not long continue to be unique in the world. The man-milliners of New York are as yet few in number, but they are kept very busy, and they are said to make dresses which will favorably compare to any made by woman's hands.

A New Fashion in Hands. Have you ever seen a pet dog sitting on his hind legs? Do you remember the pensile nature of the paws? Can you recall the idiotic helplessness expressed in the line in which they droop? If you do, you have before you a perfect representation of the new fashion (growing into great favor with ladies) of holding the hands. By so bending the arms that the elbows make acute angles, and by then allowing the entire hands, from the wrists downwards, to hang loose like hare-bells, an air of graceful imbecility is imparted to the general appearance. When you see a woman holding her hands thus, she looks like a superior sort of penguin, and you may be certain that her style is reproachless.

Real's Apotheosis. The circumstances under which John Real was buried yesterday are so remarkable as to claim more attention than is bestowed upon most affairs of the kind. Had he been a hero, perishing in a noble cause, greater homage could scarcely have been paid him. The house where the body lay was visited by thousands of people, and the face of the corpse was kissed by some of the visitors. A captain of police had to call out his reserves in order to keep Third avenue clear for the passage of cars. The coffin was wrapped in the American flag, and was almost invisible beneath the screen of flowers. The 10th Regiment turned out to do his memory honor, and formed a part in the funeral procession. When the hearse commenced to move from the house every point within view into which a human head could be stuck was filled with one. Had the best and greatest man in the city of New York died, the crowd of spectators would not have been so vast. I do not want to run the risk of saying anything undeservedly bitter of a man who is dead, even though he came by his death in such a form. I feel the short-sightedness of human judgments, and I believe that Real had provocations that few men would have endured without nursing a sentiment of revenge. But nevertheless I cannot help feeling and saying that the funeral spectacle of yesterday furnishes a very sad, strange text, from which one might reach upon the general moral tone among the lower orders of New York society. That vast assemblage was the rabble's tribute to lawlessness and riot. It was not respect for Real or sympathy with his family that drew those thousands together; it was merely an ignorant feeling of spite against the public officer who had been morally brave enough to allow the law to take its course. There is no use in my relating the shocking circumstances that accompanied the lowering of the coffin into the grave. With them the telegraphic wires will have already acquainted you. The general moral effect of such a demonstration is more than sufficient to neutralize the lesson that should have been taught by his manner of death; and the demonstration itself is merely the index to the sentiment of the rabble which elevates a ruffian into a hero.
